Cities, society, and Social Perception [Jean-Philippe Laborde and Tiziana Mancini] 2012. A central aspect of the urban experience is the perception of the city. How do people perceive cities, what do they think they are seeing, and how does this perception change over time? This book provides an overview of the social perception of cities, focusing on how people's perception of urban space is shaped by social, cultural, and political factors. It offers a comprehensive analysis of the ways in which urban space is experienced, and the role that this perception plays in shaping urban policy and decision-making. The book draws on a range of case studies from around the world, including the impact of social media on urban perception, the role of heritage and cultural identity in shaping urban space, and the impact of globalization on urban perception. It is a valuable resource for students and scholars of urban studies, as well as for urban planners and policymakers.
