Rickey’s story is told in this compelling narrative, which reaches its stunning climax in the seventh game of the 1960 World Series, when one swing of the bat heralds baseball’s eclipse as America’s major league—the Continental League—and the pooling of television revenues for the benefit of all. And Shapiro captures the audacity of Casey Stengel, the manager of the New York Mets, and the passion of the commissioner, Wilbur Jones, who helped to bring professional baseball back to the forefront of the civil rights movement. Bottom of the Ninth–Michael Shapiro 2010-04-27 Fifty years ago, as baseball faced forced on and off the field, two-large-figures tore center stage, each on a quest to reinstate the national pastime in the late 1950s, under siege. Up-and-coming cities that wanted teams of their own were being rebuffed by the majors, and in response Congress was looking into ways to revitalize the sport’s antitrust exemption. These problems were magnified by what was happening on the field, as the New York Yankees were so winning that often competition was vanishing in the American League. In Bottom of the Ninth, Michael Shapiro brings to life this watershed moment in baseball history. He shows how the legendary executive Branch Rickey saw the game’s salvation in two radical ideas: the creation of a third major league—the Continental League—and the pooling of television revenues for the benefit of all. And Shapiro captures the audacity of Casey Stengel, the manager of the New York Mets, who believed that he could bend the game to his wishes and remake how baseball was played. Their stories are interwoven with the on-field drama of pennant races and clutch performances, culminating in three classic World Series confrontations. As the tension built on and off of the field, Rickey and Stengel would find themselves outmaneuvered and defeated by the team owners who held true backcourt power—defeats that would diminish the game for decades to come. Shapiro’s compelling narrative reaches its stunning climax in the seventh game of the 1960 World Series, when one swing of the bat heralded baseball’s eclipse as America’s number-one sport.
